Jealous of Prerogative. From the London Chronicle.

The jealous care with which the house of commons has always protected itself against the encroachments of the lords City. in the matter of supply received its first and most striking proof in the short parliament of April, 1640. The house of lords, slding with King Charles in his demand for money, passed several resolutions declaring that supply ought to precede such trumpery matters as the discussion of grievances, and that the commons should be invited to discuss the subject. Pym was authorized by the commons to proceed to the lords and inform | Special Correspondence of The Star. them that this would not be tolerated. "Your lordships," he declared, "have both matter of supply and the time when the same should be made, and this before such time as the same was moved to your lordships by the commons. As a privilege the commons beg to suggest that your lordships would in your wisdom find out yourselves some sort of reparation and of prevention of the like infringement for the future." The commons, delighted with the manly behavior of their champion, passed a vote of thanks to Pym.
